

STUDY GUIDE: Photosynthesis

Converting Light to Chemical Energy

Photosynthesis is a chemical process with the following equation:

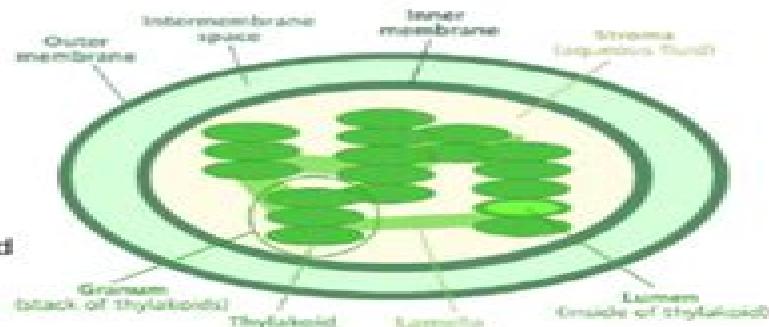

Both plants and photosynthetic bacteria are capable of this complex conversion process. The overall reaction is spurred by the energy from a photon of light striking a pigment in the chloroplast. It is thought that photosynthesis first evolved in prokaryotic cells.

Photosynthesis is broken down into two major steps which are dependent on one another: light-dependent reactions and light-independent reactions (Calvin Cycle). Both of these processes occur in the chloroplast of a photosynthetic organism.

Chloroplast

Light-dependent reactions occur in the thylakoid membranes of the chloroplast. These are the “pancakes” of the chloroplast, as they look like a stack of flattened disks. The thylakoid membranes possess important pigments called chlorophyll. This pigment has electrons in it that are excited when energy is input by a photon of light. There are many pigments, but for photosynthesis, we’ll focus more on chlorophyll, the main one.

When light strikes the chloroplast, an electron from a molecule of chlorophyll is excited and travels through the electron transport chain. In the process, a concentration gradient of hydrogen ions is formed. This will be used later to produce ATP through ATP synthase. The electron lost from chlorophyll is replaced by an electron from water. This creates more hydrogen ions and the production of oxygen, which is released from the plant.
