

When my wife comes into the room and sees me in my underwear, with my 300 Lbs on in my fist, and standing on my desk, she isn't terribly impressed with me and my work habits. My home office is the smallest room in the house, but it still feels like a 300 take in from ten feet above. I thought my angst would weaken at this altitude. "Jesu Fuvi," Julia finally says, "you're getting awfully desperate." My wife shakes her head: "That way that she can shake it and then reaches up to smack me on the ass in that way she can smack me." "Not only that," she says, "but your underwear is torn in the back." "Why won't you throw them away? They've been with you three times as long as I have." "Hush!" I say. "I'm trying to work." My wife heads back to the kitchen. She has never been supportive of my creative process. She is also what my mom would call a real gentile. When I look down at the room these are the first three things that I notice: There is a book called Best Short Stories of 1991 which my father bought me at a used bookstore. The book is old and the pages are yellowed. The book is old and the pages are yellowed.
